Rebuilding Quru: The Quiz Society of Ram Lal Anand College

I build marketing strategies by finding the gap between what a brand is doing and what its audience is telling it to do — then closing it with sharp creative and consistent execution.

Head of Marketing & Creative, Quru — Quiz Society of Ram Lal Anand College

Tenure: 2024–25 | University of Delhi

This portfolio documents four connected pieces of work: reviving a dormant society, validating demand with a low-cost pilot event, rebuilding its digital presence from zero, and scaling to a flagship event with 800+ registrations.

CASE STUDY 1 — ORGANISATIONAL TURNAROUND

Reviving a Dormant Society

Quru hadn't hosted an event in two years. Within a year, it had a 40-member team, a recognisable brand, and a flagship event with 800+ registrations.

THE PROBLEM

Quru was Ram Lal Anand College's quiz society and had been active for 5–6 years before I joined. By 2023, it had gone dormant: no events for two years, an inactive Instagram page, and a team that had stopped functioning. Awareness inside the college itself had collapsed — roughly 5% of students knew the society existed at all. There was no structure, no content pipeline, and no recruitment funnel. Rebuilding this wasn't a content task; it was a brand resurrection with zero existing trust to borrow from.

MY THINKING

A society with no credibility and no audience can't recruit a large team or run a big event first — nobody signs up for something they've never heard of. So instead of starting with the comeback event, I sequenced the rebuild in three phases:

- Phase 1 — Proof of concept: run one small, low-cost, high-interest quiz to re-establish that Quru could still deliver a good event (covered in Case Study 2).
- Phase 2 — Rebuild the team: use the momentum from that first event to run an open orientation and recruitment drive, since a 40-member team running structured events at scale needed a real funnel, not informal word-of-mouth.
- Phase 3 — Scale and specialise: split the new team into functional departments (marketing & creatives, events, content writing) so that growth in event frequency didn't collapse under one or two people doing everything, which is what had likely caused the earlier decline.

I also made a deliberate choice to host college-exclusive events for Ram Lal Anand students specifically, alongside our open-circuit quizzes. The logic: an open-only event lets a college audience opt out completely, while a few owned, internal events force re-discovery of the society among the people most likely to join the team later.

THE WORK

- Recruitment & orientation drive that generated 200+ registrations for team positions.
- Team restructured and scaled from 10 to 40 members (the college's society cap), organised into Marketing & Creative, Events, and Content Writing departments.
- A recurring quiz calendar — Indian Pop Trivia, FLAMES Quiz, India Quiz, Chandrayaan Quiz — each averaging 150+ registrations, drawing participants from RLA College as well as SRCC, Hindu College, Jamia Millia Islamia, IIT, and other Delhi NCR colleges.

- 5+ internal quiz practice sessions across different themes, run specifically for underperforming team members, to raise the team’s competitive standard before sending them to represent Quru externally.
- Branded merchandise (T-shirts I designed) issued to members representing Quru at external college quiz circuits.

THE RESULT

10 → 40 Team size (max cap)	200+ Recruitment registrations	30+ External competitions won by members	~5% → wide College-wide awareness
---------------------------------------	--	---	---

Within roughly a year, Quru went from a society most students didn’t know existed to one running a full event calendar with cross-college reach, a functioning department structure, and members winning competitions at other colleges — which carried the Quru name (and the college’s) into circuits it previously had no presence in at all.

WHAT I’D DO DIFFERENTLY

I’d formalise the department structure earlier than I did. We scaled the team to 40 quickly once recruitment took off, but the marketing/events/content split happened reactively, after people were already on board, rather than being part of the original recruitment pitch. Defining those tracks upfront would likely have improved how members self-selected into roles they were actually suited for.

CASE STUDY 2 — PILOT CAMPAIGN

The Comeback Quiz: Proving Demand Before Scaling

Before recruiting a 40-member team, I needed evidence that Quru still mattered. A small, sharply-themed quiz became that evidence.

THE PROBLEM

Quru had no events for two years and no digital presence to promote anything even if we had one. Jumping straight into a large-scale flagship event would have been a high-risk bet on a brand nobody currently trusted or followed. We needed a low-cost way to test whether students would actually show up.

MY THINKING

I picked a small, specific, easy-to-explain topic — an Indian Constitution quiz — over something broader. A focused theme is easier to promote in a single caption or poster, easier for students to immediately understand the value of (“will this help me with GK / current affairs / exams”), and cheap to produce since it needed no elaborate set design or props, just a strong quiz format and consistent promotion. The goal wasn’t to make money or go viral — it was to generate enough proof of demand to justify a recruitment drive right after.

THE WORK

- Designed and promoted a single-topic quiz (Indian Constitution) as Quru’s first event after a two-year gap.
- Used the event specifically as the springboard into an orientation and recruitment cycle held immediately after.

THE RESULT

100+ Participants registered	1st Event after 2-year gap

The quiz became Quru’s most important early win: it validated that there was real, untapped demand for quiz events at RLA College, and that momentum fed directly into a recruitment drive that pulled in 200+ applicants and rebuilt the team from 10 to 40 members.

WHAT I’D DO DIFFERENTLY

I didn’t track where registrations actually came from (Instagram, word-of-mouth, college noticeboards, friend referrals). For a pilot specifically designed to test demand, that channel-level data would have told us which promotion channel to double down on for every event afterward, instead of us learning that gradually over the next few quizzes.

CASE STUDY 3 — DIGITAL & SOCIAL MEDIA STRATEGY

Building a Digital Identity From a Dead Page

Quru's Instagram was inactive with no clear visual identity. I rebuilt it around theme-matched creative and interactive formats, taking it from 550 to 1,500 followers.

THE PROBLEM

Quru's Instagram page was inactive, with no consistent posting, no visual identity, and no presence on LinkedIn. For an offline event-based society, this meant almost no way to reach students outside whoever happened to hear about an event in person — and no credible-looking presence for a new recruit or external college to check before deciding to engage with us.

MY THINKING

Rather than running generic event-announcement content, I matched every event's visual language — posters, presentation decks, and reels — to its specific quiz theme. An Indian Pop Trivia quiz got pop-culture-styled visuals and reels; a different themed quiz got its own distinct look. The reasoning: theme-matched design does double duty as both promotion and a preview of what the event will actually feel like, which makes the content itself communicate “this will be fun and on-theme,” not just “here's an event happening.”

On top of static promotion, I introduced interactive Instagram Stories trivia — posting quiz questions directly to the audience between events. This kept the page active in the gaps between event cycles (rather than going quiet for weeks at a time) and reinforced Quru's core identity: a quizzing society, even in its content.

I also used consistent highlight-reel coverage of each event across Instagram and LinkedIn, so that anyone visiting the page — a prospective member, another college, or a teacher — immediately saw a track record of real, recent events rather than a static or dead-looking page.

THE WORK

- Theme-matched visual identity (posters, decks, reels) designed per event rather than a single generic template.
- Interactive Instagram Story trivia series run between events to maintain page activity and reinforce brand identity.
- Consistent event highlight coverage across Instagram and LinkedIn.
- Designed Quru-branded merchandise (T-shirts) worn by members at external college events, extending the visual identity beyond the page itself.

THE RESULT

550 → 1,500 Instagram followers	100K+ Views	60K+ Interactions

Instagram followers nearly tripled over the year, with over 100,000 views and 60,000 interactions across content. The page went from inactive to functioning as an actual discovery and credibility channel — used by prospective members and other colleges to gauge Quru before engaging with it.

WHAT I'D DO DIFFERENTLY

I didn't have access to granular post-level analytics (which specific format — Stories trivia vs. reels vs. highlight posts — drove the most follower growth versus just views). With that breakdown, I'd have been able to double down earlier on whichever format was actually converting viewers into followers, rather than maintaining all formats at roughly equal effort throughout the year.

CASE STUDY 4 — FLAGSHIP EVENT CAMPAIGN

Qurukshetra: Scaling to a Flagship Event

The annual flagship event built on a year of smaller wins, pulling 800+ registrations and 90+ positive reviews from participants and faculty.

THE PROBLEM

By the time of Qurukshetra, Quru had run several mid-sized quizzes (150+ registrations each) and grown its digital following, but had never staged an event at flagship scale. The challenge was converting a year of smaller, steady wins into one large event that could anchor Quru's identity as a serious cross-college quizzing society, not just a college-internal club that had recently come back to life.

MY THINKING

Qurukshetra wasn't a cold launch — it was built deliberately on top of existing momentum. By that point we had a cross-college participant base (SRCC, Hindu College, Jamia, IIT, and other DU/NCR colleges) from earlier quizzes, a 40-member team experienced in running events end-to-end, and a recognisable digital presence to promote it through. The strategy was to apply everything that had worked at the smaller event scale — themed creative, memes and light commentary during hosting to keep the event entertaining rather than dry, and consistent pre-event promotion — at a significantly larger scale, rather than reinventing the format for a one-off flagship.

THE WORK

- Led creative direction and marketing for Quru's annual flagship event, Qurukshetra.
- Applied the theme-matched visual identity and humour-led hosting style developed across the year's smaller events, scaled up for a flagship audience.
- Coordinated promotion across Instagram and LinkedIn, leveraging the cross-college audience built through the year's earlier quizzes.

THE RESULT

800+ Registrations	90+ Positive reviews from participants & faculty

Qurukshetra became Quru's largest event of the year by a wide margin, drawing more than 5x the registrations of the society's regular quizzes, and received over 90 positive reviews from both student participants and teachers — validating that the society's turnaround had reached a scale and credibility it hadn't had even at its peak five to six years earlier.

WHAT I'D DO DIFFERENTLY

I'd build a structured post-event feedback form rather than relying on the informal positive reviews we collected. At 800+ registrations, even a basic NPS-style survey would have given us a quantified satisfaction score and specific improvement areas to carry into the next flagship edition, instead of only qualitative, anecdotal feedback.

Skills Developed Through This Role

Leading this turnaround end-to-end — from a dormant society to a 40-member, multi-department team running a flagship event — built a specific set of skills, applied directly rather than learned in theory:

- Leadership — led a 16-member core marketing & creative team within the larger 40-member society.
- Strategic sequencing — structured a multi-phase comeback (pilot → recruitment → scale) instead of attempting a high-risk relaunch.
- Brand & graphic design — built theme-matched visual identities per event, including merchandise design.
- Content writing & social strategy — grew Instagram from 550 to 1,500 followers using interactive and highlight-driven content.
- Team building & training — designed and ran 5+ practice sessions to raise team performance for external competitions.
- Cross-college networking — built relationships and participation pipelines with SRCC, Hindu College, Jamia, IIT, and other DU/NCR colleges.
- Live event hosting & quizzing — hosted events with scripted humour and commentary to keep large audiences engaged.
- Confidence under scale — went from managing 150-participant events to a single 800+ registration flagship within the same year.
